Today – For the remainder of today, dry conditions, clear skies, and generally calm winds will prevail across the area. High temperatures will hover around the mid 50s this afternoon before falling to the mid 30s to low 40s overnight. The combination of light winds and low temperatures near freezing will create the potential for early morning frost just before sunrise Wednesday. Sunset: 6:00pm

Extended forecast – Through mid-week primarily dry conditions, mostly clear to partly cloudy skies, and generally light winds will prevail across the area. By Saturday, a frontal boundary may influence scattered to isolated rain showers early in the morning. Winds may pick up behind the front bringing wind gusts up to 30mph. High temperatures daily will hover in the middle 50s to low 60s though overnight lows will be near freezing. With lighter winds expected midweek in addition to dewpoints below freezing, early morning frost will be possible. Much colder air will usher into the area by Sunday morning with a hard freeze possible.

Forecast prepared by DTN meteorologists Angel Howson and Wade Stettner.
